

HAT

HAT is the name of any of several kinds of coverings for the head. A hat consists of a crown, the part that fits on the head; and, in most cases, a circular brim. Hats differ from other head coverings, such as bonnets, caps, helmets, and hoods, most of which have a small brim or no brim. But the word hat, as used in this article, refers to such brimless headgear as well.

Hats vary widely in material and style, depending largely on the climate and people's customs. For example, a Russian farmer wears a snug fur hat to protect himself from the cold. A South American cowboy wears a felt gaucho hat as part of his traditional costume. The members of each branch of a nation's armed services wear a different type of hat as part of their uniform. People also wear hats as an important accessory to their clothing. As a result, fashion often determines the styles of hat that are worn.

Throughout the centuries, the desire of people to be fashionable has resulted in many kinds of unusual hats. During the 1400's, many European women wore a tall,

Some Kinds of Hats Worn Today

People wear hats for several reasons. Hats may be worn for protection from the climate or from injury. People also wear hats that communicate information about their occupation. Some hats are worn for decoration. The reasons for wearing hats cause much variety in hat styles throughout the world.

Hats Worn for Protection

Robert W. Young, DFI

Farmers in Indonesia

WORLD BOOK photo

Construction Worker in the U.S.

Howard Sochurek, Woodfin Camp Inc.

Herdsmen in Siberia

Hats Worn for Communication

H. Taylor, De Wys, Inc.

Bishops in Greece

George Nelson, Artstreet

Bullfighter in Mexico

Alex Webb, Magnum

Policewoman in the United States

Hats Worn for Decoration

Woodfin Camp Inc.

Woman in Africa

WORLD BOOK photo

Couple in the United States

Werner Stoy, DFI

Girls in Taiwan